State and local governments form an integral part of the federal system of government in the United States. The relationship of citizens to these political units is one of the clearest illustrations of pure democracy in the U.S. Education, crime prevention, transportation, and other policies affecting our daily lives are largely under the control of states and localities, and people have more direct input into the workings of government at these levels.